(A) Aye-aye is a rare type of lemurs in Madagascar. They have a typical look of a lemur except for a very thin finger. This much thinner middle finger practically used to tap the tree trunk to locate the grubs, their primary food, is considered unlucky and the arrival of death and evil by local people. Legend has it that aye-eyes could curse a person simply by pointing at him, so many aye-eyes have been killed by the locals over the years. This belief together with deforestation has made aye-eyes threatened and even endangered.

Though it may take a lot of time for the locals to let go of the hatred for aye-eyes and change their logging behavior, conservation groups are trying their best to save the wildlife animal. With the aim of preserving natural diversity, a charity has been working with the local government and successfully bred eight new animals of aye-eyes. San Diego Zoo Global, a non-profit organization, is conserving aye-eyes through research and education. It cooperates with local scientists to conduct research to better understand aye-eyes' activity patterns and human disturbance. It also works with local educators in schools near the forest to inspire schoolchildren to care for their native environment and wildlife.

It typically lasts longer than a regular commercial and features daily, informative and even entertaining contents which make us feel like we are watching a TV show rather than a sales promotion.

Infomercials also go online. Many Youtube videos are considered infomercials. Some companies make their own infomercials to catch the attention of a different group of customers on the Internet. Other companies cooperate with prominent Youtubers for their infomercials. These Youtubers with great popularity or even plenty of fans brilliantly find a suitable placement of the products into their creations. As their fans enjoy the intelligently-created videos, they are actually watching yet another commercial. Useful, creative and entertaining content of interests are presented to secretly instill the viewers with the advantages of the products.

The magic is that they seem to work better than traditional commercials. These videos do not usually start off by showing their purpose of selling goods. Instead, the creators of online infomercials usually film like talking to a friend, building trust and friendship with the viewers. A Youtuber and critic once said, "people on the Internet give you money because they feel like they know you." The trustworthiness may eventually lead to their clicking on the website links of the promoted products you provide in the information box.
