Note-taking is commonly considered the best way to help a learner gain new knowledge. Nonetheless, it disappoints learners when they find out the fact that precise and colorful notes do not lead to the satisfying exam results, which may, 37, result in learned helplessness. In fact, an ideal note-taking method should always keep the learner 38 and help them understand what they are learning. If your notes cannot meet these needs, perhaps you should try the Cornell note-taking system.

The Cornell note-taking system divides a page of the notebook into three major parts. The Notes Section is a wide column on the right side for you to 39 what the teacher said during the class. Meanwhile, you should restrict yourself 40 applying abbreviations, symbols, charts, and mind maps to highlight the essential ideas. The left narrow column is the Cue Section. Try to 41 the contents of the prior column to simpler keywords here. After that, cover the Notes part, and challenge yourself to 42 as much information as you can based on the cues. Below the two columns is the Summary Section, 43 you can reorganize the main ideas of the two columns in your own words after a thorough reflection. Last but not least, you must arrange a regular review to prevent you 44 forgetting. By making use of this note-taking system, your learning is expected to be more productive and successful.

In the 19th century, bird poop, known as guano, was a major agricultural resource. It has a high nitrogen and nutrient content, so it is excellent for plant 45. It was so important as a crop fertilizer that countries went to war over it! From the 1840s to the 1860s, Peru gained a lot of 46 by exporting large amounts of guano found on the Chincha Islands, 21 kilometers off its coast. Up to 60 percent of Peru's economy was based on guano. By 1870, Peru's guano supply was almost 47. New sources were needed. They were in luck, finding large amounts of guano in the Atacama Desert. There was plenty of this "white gold" there to keep them in business. But there was a problem. The desert was 48 in Chile. That fact didn't bother Peru and Bolivia, which was Peru's ally. The two countries went to war with Chile to get the poop.

Chile had a superior army. It took control of the desert and the island's guano deposits within six months. With the increased use of 49 fertilizers in the 1920s, the need for guano as a fertilizer went down. This should have benefited Peru, but these new fertilizers were being produced by Chile with nitrates found in the Atacama Desert. This fact only made Peruvian wounds worse. To this day, Peru's economy has still not 50. What about Bolivia? They lost their entire coastline to Chile and became a(n) 51 country. This is still a sore point between the countries even now. Many people in Bolivia think this land loss is the cause of their economic problems.

If you have searched for effective productivity systems, chances are you have probably known a thing or two about bullet journals, also called Bujo by some. In short, it is a way to arrange information into bulleted lists. For the past few years, this trend has already become one of the hottest ways of taking notes and collecting your thoughts. Although some people regarded the Bujo system as just another productivity fad and predicted that it would fade soon, the truth is it didn't and has won over the hearts of many users ever since.

Bullet journaling has brought note-taking back to the basics: a dotted notebook and a pen. That is, you can get rid of piles of sticky notes and there won't be endless apps fighting for your attention. Getting started is easy. Below are a few quick steps. First, number the pages. All pages should be numbered in the lower-left corner, making items easier to find. Second, create a key. In the Bujo system, every item falls into Tasks, Events, or Notes, labelled with different icons. Short descriptions are needed for each entry, but the symbols make reviewing your notes a lot more efficient. Third, write an index. Leave a few blank pages at the beginning of your journal and make it into a table of contents. Just write down the topic names and their corresponding page numbers. In that way, you won't need to thumb through the entire journal just for a piece of information.

Visit our website if you are interested in knowing a bit further. Though there are a few basic concepts and common notation symbols in the Bujo system, remember, how you use your journal is totally up to you. Feel free to be as creative or uncreative as you want. Give the Bujo a try and enjoy it!

A few hours before Greta Thunberg's speech at the UN, I watched my daughters, ages twenty-two and sixteen, step over the newspaper which had been delivered to our doorstep that morning. Did they not see it? Were they waiting for someone else to pick it up for them?

Malala Yousafzai tweeted and expressed outrage publicly when women's right to education was in question. Greta Thunberg, on the other hand, successfully captured the public's attention to the reduction of carbon footprint via the school strike for the worsening climate conditions. They care not about themselves but the whole world. Seeing their altruistic behaviors, instead of asking my kids to act like them, I started to reflect on my childhood and parenting style.

I worry about my children's lack of empathy more than their safety. When I look back on my youth, I used to be a self-centered person who took everything for granted. Over time, I realized the necessity that I should be responsible for my life. Therefore, even though the insignificance of my presence in the community upset me, I surely understood that only I could make my life worthwhile by doing something to make this world become a better one. It mattered to me what I did with my life, even if it made no difference to others.

But now, looking at my two daughters sticking their eyeballs to smartphones and caring more about peers' attention rather than seeking ways to stand up in a society where women are hidden, I couldn't help but panic. Social media platforms are rife with meaningless photos and videos that influence my children much more than the world in front of their eyes. There seems no so-called effective way I can guide them.

I try to keep every conversation open. We watch documentaries and TED talks, share relevant news clips together during daily chats. But on days like this, when I pick up the newspaper from the doorstep, I wonder if I am doing enough. Before going to bed, I sent them a video of Greta Thunberg's speech and restrained myself from writing the caption — look what your peers are doing and achieving!

Brandon and Rebecca are two students of PCSH who used to take everything for granted. In the past, Brandon always turned on the air conditioner during winter and seldom turned off the light whenever he left the room. However, after watching Greta Thunberg's speech at UN from the YouTube, he managed to make this world a better one.

Rebecca, on the other hand, constantly fell asleep and swiped smartphone during class. After listening to Malala's speech on the podcast, she realized how precious it is for a girl like her to sit in the classroom and learn. Inspired by Malala, Rebecca dedicated herself to making this society much fairer.

Last week, the teacher of tenth grader's compulsory course asked the whole class to conduct a project about the SDGs. According to the descriptions above, which one of the SDGs should Brandon study more about? As for Rebecca, which two of the SDGs might be the ones that she is interested in?
